Adopting an ABM mindset

What is ABM?

A strategic approach for building and optimizing personalized buying journeys within a strategic set of targeted accounts, at scale.

Why did Baker Hughes need it?

Baker Hughes approached BOL to address new realities in the B2B marketing landscape. With so much online data at their fingertips, customers preferring to self-educate had turned the traditional world of sales and marketing on its head – and now expected personalized content that addressed their unique challenges and pain points.

What strategic shifts would be required?

To effectively set the stage for a successful ABM campaign, BOL worked closely with Baker Hughes to orchestrate philosophical shifts in the company's B2B approach.

From product to solution

Messaging could no longer focus on product features and capabilities – but rather on how those features and capabilities met the unique needs of unique audience segments in different parts of the sales funnel.

From many to one-to-one

To ensure efficiency and effectiveness, high-level content for a broad audience would need to be distilled into highly personalized messaging for hyper-targeted audience members.

From traditional to data-driven

The availability of new consumer data made it possible to garner deeper insights into who needed Baker Hughes and why. Tapping into those insights would make it possible to drive both message personalization and business performance.

Identifying customers

Focusing marketing dollars where they'll make the greatest impact is the cornerstone of an ABM mindset. To do that, Baker Hughes needed to identify the high-value targets most likely to convert.

Gathering data and discerning insight

To help Baker Hughes acquire better contact-level data, BOL created a sophisticated algorithm based on an extensive list of job title inclusion and exclusion words.

Building a better customer experience

BOL helped Baker Hughes create a customer-focused buying experience that identified and addressed individual customer pain points across the funnel – and created a seamless, consistently branded buying experience that optimized customer convenience.
